

Shoprite's clothing brand: Is Uniq unique?

 By Jonathan Cherry

18 Apr 2023

There was a time in South Africa when if you wanted to buy a quality basic tee shirt, work shirt, school shirt, socks, underwear, etc. you automatically headed straight for Woolworths. Woolies owned the basics market in South Africa; they had the monopoly for decades...until, weirdly, they decided against it.

Uniqlo. Source: Cherryflava

Uniq, Source: Shoprite Group

Woolies purposely chose to step away from their entrenched 'basics' monopoly and willingly opened the gates for competition in the space.

Since then everyone has been fighting for 'basics' dominance in South Africa, but the position of brand leader in the category has never been filled. There is perhaps a sense that if Woolies had to wake up one day and decide to take back their position of 'basics' kingpin, that they have enough historical brand clout to snatch the prize back quickly, but until the giant awakens - the race continues.

Introducing Uniq: Shoprite's foray into fashion

31 Mar 2023

Uniq vs Uniqlo

The newest 'basics' offering on the competitive landscape is from the Shoprite Checkers Group – a business which we have for the past while, greatly admired for its shrewd strategic moves and excellent operational nous.

Yet what they purposely chose to do with the opportunity to compete in this space - is to basically replicate the Uniqlo brand, with just enough difference to make it very difficult to legally challenge in the local market.

Uniqlo. Source: Rowanlovescars, CC BY-SA 4.0 , via Wikimedia Commons

Truth be told, this deliberate strategic choice greatly confuses us. Why would Shoprite Checkers willingly choose to invest in a brand and a visual merchandising method that is clearly a replication of a very successful existing global brand?

With the unlimited amount of creative talent that they have access to, backed by the financial might of Africa's biggest retail group, why was this particular strategy seen as a better option than alternatively creating and building something that doesn't carry this kind of reputational baggage?

Uniq. Source: Shoprite Group

On a personal level, we find this choice very disappointing. As the leading retailer on the continent and an admired corporate citizen, we just assumed that they would 'do better'.

Yes, legally they will probably be able to get away with it because proving something is a direct ripoff in a court of law is incredibly difficult, but this kind of behaviour is not what we should accept from our corporate, listed leaders.

Replicating creative assets

We're not naive to the ways and means of the world obviously. Philosophically there has always been a raging debate about the ethical relevance of originality, attribution and where the line can and shouldn't be crossed.

From a purely strategic brand perspective however, there is 'creative licence' that ultimately creates something new from borrowed inputs that still carries risk (which is what most sampling is), and then there is the 'unauthorised use' of a recognised creative asset that is replicated to try to reduce risk. In our minds the Uniq brand, as it is currently being presented, falls into the latter category.

Even if you argue that a line hasn't been crossed in your eyes, for many others the similarity will stir up questions in their minds that will certainly prove to be a distraction and a nuisance for Uniq in the future. Hiring Adams & Adams to defend your position in the local market is expensive and time-consuming, so if you have the choice right up front, why would you choose that avoidable route?

#BizTrends2023: Retail's future is the 'Theatre of Dreams'

Jonathan Cherry 10 Jan 2023

---

Our suggestion is there would be a lot of value in doing a comprehensive scenario planning exercise to map out the alternative futures the current and possible choices will plausibly create, and from there management will be able to make better, more informed strategic decisions based on this more considered insight.

Our hope is that before they go ahead and roll out more Uniq stores, they reconsider their choice here and choose to put their convictions behind something that is 'a bit more of their own' instead.

Uniqlo is great and should certainly be admired and desired, but trying to be 'just like them' without their express permission not only shows a lack of a moral compass, but a lack of self-confidence.

So 'no'... Uniq is certainly not unique enough for us.

Article provided courtesy of Cherryflava.

ABOUT JONATHAN CHERRY

Jonathan Cherry is a futurist and business strategist who works with organisations to design better strategies that effectively create a significant competitive advantage. Over the past 20 years he's worked with retailers such as Yuppiefchef, Woolworths and Kitchen Warehouse (Australia), has an MPhil Futures Studies from Stellenbosch University and is a member of the Association of Professional Futurists.

» Shoprite's clothing brand: Is Uniq unique? - 18 Apr 2023

» #BizTrends2023: Retail's future is the 'Theatre of Dreams' - 10 Jan 2023

» Why listening to what your customers want is a terrible idea - 19 May 2022

- #BizTrends2022: The great retail powershift is here - 12 Jan 2022
- How to sell ugly - 5 Aug 2021

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>