

A stranger to your selfie

24 Jul 2015

No, this is not about how men who take frequent selfies are more narcissistic and psychopathic (they apparently are, though)...

It's about how you trust the familiar and how important it is to build familiarity in brands.

For instance, have you ever noticed how a photo of your face looks different to how you perceive yourself, or how your own voicemail message has this strange-sounding person on the other side?

© Sergdibrova – 123RF.com

The photo phenomenon occurs because you're accustomed to the slightly different reverse image of yourself. You know - the one that you gaze at lovingly in the mirror each morning. A camera does not reverse your image, so a photo reveals the stranger that's really you.

The voice effect occurs because bones in your skull make your voice sound unique to your ears. This causes you to perceive it differently to the squeaky one everybody else hears.

The point is that you can often find the 'real you' less appealing than the one you are more familiar with. The same goes for brands and products and most other things for that matter - a phenomenon called the mere-exposure effect.

Let's face it, despite claims to the contrary, people don't really fall deeply in love with 99% of brands out there. They aren't rationally persuaded to buy every product they do. Much of advertising is really about making a brand more familiar to people by repeatedly (but not excessively) exposing them to it in a pleasant way.

This familiarity principle also causes marketers and advertisers to have rose coloured goggles when they dote over their own products, brands and advertisements. Sometimes it makes sense to invest in a bit of research to provide an objective and quantitative view of how a potential customer may really perceive them.

ABOUT JOHN LAURENCE

John is MD of HeadSpace Neuromarketing and is an experienced marketer with over 15 years in the marketing and advertising industry. As well as having worked in marketing research, he has headed the marketing divisions of two blue-chip global brands in South Africa and has developed strategy for several well-known brands. Contact him on tell +27(0)83 230 8764 or email john@head-space.biz.

The attention economy - 13 Nov 2018

How emotion affects advertising - 25 May 2017

Brand trust - It's in the eyes - 3 Aug 2015
A stranger to your selfie - 24 Jul 2015
How do you boil a frog? - 21 Jul 2015

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: https://www.bizcommunity.com